Habitat and Distribution

Quolls call various habitats home, including rainforests, woodlands, and grasslands, across the Australian landscape. Their distribution encompasses the eastern and northern regions of Australia, extending from Cape York Peninsula to Tasmania.

Hunting and Diet

As skilled predators, quolls primarily hunt at night, utilizing their acute senses to locate prey. Their diet consists of a wide range of small animals such as rodents, birds, insects, and reptiles. Quolls are also known to scavenge on carrion.

Social Behavior

Quolls exhibit a range of social behaviors, varying among species. Some species, like the Eastern Quoll, are solitary creatures, while others, such as the Northern Quoll, live in small family groups. They communicate through vocalizations, scent marking, and body language.

Reproduction

Quolls reach sexual maturity at around one year of age. Females give birth to a litter of up to eight joeys, which are born in a rudimentary state and continue their development within their mother's pouch.

Conservation Status

Several species of quolls are listed as threatened or endangered due to habitat loss, predation by introduced species, and disease. Conservation efforts are underway to protect these remarkable animals and ensure their survival.
